Degenerative Suspensory Ligament Disease

I am at the farm to euthanize a friend. Joe is a 20-something Arabian show horse. He has an impressive show name, but I just liked to think of him as Joe. I thought about how unfair it was that he should have a life-threatening hereditary disease through no fault of his own. His mind is still willing, but his body has betrayed him. Joe has degenerative suspensory ligament disease (DSLSD). We had managed it for several years, and just two seasons ago he was still competing at a high level. But now he has more painful days than good ones, and it has become increasingly difficult for him to get up. Today Joe's hindquarters have given up the fight and he is unable to rise.

Degenerative suspensory ligament disease causes chronic suspensory ligament breakdown—this structure runs down the back of the cannon bone and attaches to the sesamoid bones. Without its support the fetlock joints (most commonly the rear) drop below their normal angle. Resulting ligament breakdown, flexor tendon injury, and osteoarthritis in the fetlock, hock, and stifle joints lead to debilitating lameness. The disease is manageable but not curable.

Veterinarians first reported DSLSD in 1981 in Peruvian Pasos. Since then, we've learned a number of breeds can develop it, including Arabians, American Saddlebreds, American Quarter Horses, Morgans, Thoroughbreds, and European Warmbloods. We have also learned that it affects more than just the suspensory ligaments; the abnormal accumulation of proteoglycans it causes impacts tendons and other connective tissues, as well.

Proteoglycans are protein complexes that provide structural support to the cells that make up ligaments, tendons, and joints. While some proteoglycans in a ligament provide strength, too many will weaken the ligament. This phenomenon has prompted some researchers to suggest changing the name of the disease to equine systemic proteoglycan accumulation. Whenever a disease has more than one name or changes names, it usually means we do not understand it completely. This is certainly true with DSLSD.

Researchers believe DSLSD to be hereditary, although they have not determined the exact lineage. There has been recent speculation that metabolic diseases such as pituitary pars intermedia dysfunction (PPID) could play a role. While PPID does disrupt the suspensory ligament fibers, it is unclear if there is a cause-and-effect relationship between these conditions or if they just happen to occur at the same time. Because of this possibility, test horses with DSLSD for metabolic disease.

Veterinarians diagnose DSLSD based primarily on clinical signs. Researchers have been attempting to develop a diagnostic test to identify DSLSD before symptoms occur, so owners can avoid breeding horses that carry the genetic disorder, but this is still in the works.

Because there is no cure, management centers around supporting the affected limbs. Mild to moderate exercise every other day has been shown to improve clinical signs. Shoeing to support the suspensory ligament and superficial and deep flexor tendons can also be beneficial.

Because the suspensory ligament is degenerating, the flexor tendons assume more concussive force when the leg hits the ground. This can cause injury to both of these structures. Support wraps while exercising can help prevent injuries. Maintaining these horses in support wraps over long periods, however, might lead to flexor tendon laxity (looseness) and increased risk of injury.

As the suspensory ligament apparatus becomes less effective, the fetlock, hock, and stifle become increasingly hyperextended. This gives the hind limb a straight appearance. The hyperextended fetlock joints can even become subluxated (partially dislocated). Traumatic injury can occur if the fetlock joint hyperextends to the point that the pastern bone strikes the cannon bone. Hyperextension of all three joints leads to abnormal stress on the joint cartilage and, eventually, osteoarthritis.

We can manage osteoarthritis with non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs, steroidal joint injections, and/or regenerative medicine. Some veterinarians speculate that we should not treat DSLSD-induced osteoarthritis with polysulfated glycosaminoglycan (Adequan) because it may contribute to proteoglycan accumulation in the ligaments.

Like any disease without a cure, a host of "natural remedies" and "nutritional supplements" have popped up, with manufacturers claiming they cure DSLSD. To date these supplements have not been scientifically studied for efficacy. Ultimately, we might not be able to cure horses like Joe, but wiser breeding practices could be the key to eradicating this devastating disease. 🐾

Equine Hives

Though they can occur during any season, equine hives, or urticaria is a common problem with horses during the summer months. Hives present as circular wheals covering large areas of the body. They are sometimes accompanied by itching. Hives are a sign of disease, not a specific disease itself. There are both immunologic and non-immunologic causes of hives. Most are immunologic. Non-immunologic causes include pressure on skin, sunlight, heat, cold, exercise, stress, and genetics.

Immunologic causes include insect bite hypersensitivity caused by stable flies, mosquitoes, culicoides (biting midges), horse flies, and chiggers. (Follow link for more information on insect related health concerns) Also included are atopic dermatitis, food allergies, drug reactions, dewormers, antibiotics, vaccines, various medications, vitamins, and supplements. Bacteria, virus, fungus, protozoa and parasites can also trigger hives.

Sometimes contact with a substance or material such as a fly spray or bedding may cause hives. There are so many possibilities that finding the cause is often difficult. It is helpful to note if any product or care changes precipitated the hives. Removing potential elements one at a time and waiting a minimum of 1 - 2 weeks to see a difference is a time consuming and unrewarding method of determination.

Intradermal skin testing is the gold standard for identifying allergens to be included in immunotherapy vaccines for horses. This is done very similar to allergy testing in humans. Hyposensitization based on intradermal skin testing has a 60 - 70% good to excellent rating in horses completing the treatment.

Managing horses with hives includes:

- 1) Keeping horses stalled at dawn and dusk when insects are at their peak
- 2) Applying fly repellent to the horse twice daily
- 3) Placing fans in stabling areas to discourage insects
- 4) Using fly sheets and masks to prevent insect access
- 5) Screening stalls and barns to prevent insect entry
- 6) Treating the hives (urticaria) as directed by your veterinarian

Treatments that your veterinarian may recommend include:

- Systemic steroids
- Topical steroids
- Topical antipruritics

- Antihistamines
- Immunomodulatory drugs

Chronic recurring urticaria is the most common in horses. The most frequently occurring lesion is a wheal, a flat-topped nodule with steep walled sides caused by edema in the dermis. They may be a few millimeters to several centimeters in diameter. Each lesion lasts 24 - 48 hours. Lesions can occur anywhere but are most common on neck, trunk, and legs.

Angioedema is a more diffuse edema involving subcutaneous tissues. It usually involves the head and neck and extremities. This signifies a much more serious disease. Angioedema is rare but can be life threatening.

Call your veterinarian right away if your horse starts to develop any signs of an allergic reaction such as hives. Your horse can be diagnosed, and a specific treatment plan established. Call Conley and Koontz Equine Hospital if we may be of service.
